The American Travelling Morrice was originally composed of dancers and musicians from Binghamton, NY and Boston, MA.

Sharp and others traveled throughout England and collected the old music and dances from musicians and dancers like Kimber. They published the notations and urged folk clubs and schools to teach Morris dancing. Today there are hundreds of sides dancing in England, and over 200 teams have sprung up in North America over the past 50 years.

Happily, in 1899, a chance meeting sparked a rebirth of interest in the Morris. On Boxing Day (December 26th) of that year, the Headington Quarry Morris Men, accompanied by their concertina player William Kimber, danced at a cottage near the city of Oxford. Cecil Sharp, an ethnomusicologist, classical musician, and composer, saw that performance and was intrigued. Sharp invited Kimber to return the next day so that he could notate the tunes. Thus began a collaboration that resulted in a remarkably successful Morris revival.

The Industrial Revolution, however, brought social changes that eroded the basis of village folk life. Young people left the farm villages to work in urban factories. As the rural population declined, the number of Morris teams shrank until only a handful remained active.

The Morris flourished in the 17th and 18th centuries, surviving flood, famine, war, plague, and Oliver Cromwell. Hundreds of villages throughout England supported Morris teams or sides, and the dancers often competed for prizes at country fairs.

Morris dancing is an old English country tradition. Its origin and why it is called 'Morris' are long forgotten, but there are written and pictorial references to it from the 15th century. Shakespeare cherished the Morris and made allusions to it in many of his plays.
